Unauthorized Banksy show strips street art of its power while cashing in on its fame

Art dealer and one-time agent Steve Lazarides may no longer have a relationship with the infamous, and anonymous, British street artist, but that hasn't stopped him from bringing some of the vandal's best work to Toronto.

The unwary consumer who decided to spend $35 to enter the Banksy exhibition making its North American premiere in a Toronto warehouse will see lots of the prints that the anonymous British street artist has sold to underwrite his graffiti activism.

One is Festival, a bitter image that shows music fans lining up to buy $30 T-shirts bearing the slogan Destroy Capitalism. The irony of this exploitative show unauthorized by the artist is enough to make a critic gag.

The Art of Banksy, which has grown in scale since first stops in Melbourne, Amsterdam, Tel Aviv and Auckland, is organized by art dealer Steve Lazarides, who was Banksy's close collaborator and agent from 1997 until 2008, as well as concert promoters Live Nation and Starvox Exhibits. The organizers stress it contains no art ripped from the street; rather, it features about 80 works on loan from collectors who bought them online or at Banksy's own commercial shows.

But Lazarides has no current relationship with Banksy and told The Globe and Mail the artist did not respond to a message when first informed of the show, which started touring in 2016. Apparently, neither Banksy nor his management have complained so far; the artist's website says only that he is not represented by Lazarides. The dealer argues that Banksy belongs to the public and the public has a right to see the work, but when asked whether the artist would like the show, the dealer replied "Absolutely not."

Under both Canadian and British copyright law, artists have moral rights in their work. When you buy a painting from a living artist, you don't buy the right to reproduce it on greeting cards. At this show, the gift shop stuffed with Banksy merch[andise] as well as promotional material featuring Banksy's famed image of a girl with a balloon and the cartoonish face of a rat, all seem to violate that principle. Furthermore, in Canada, an artist's exhibition rights are also enshrined in law – work cannot be exhibited without the artist's permission. The standard practice in Canadian museums, and in many international ones, is to pay artists fees for shows.

Of course, Banksy, who routinely lifts historic and pop-culture imagery himself, has never asked anyone's permission to stencil his political cartoons on walls and buildings in Britain and around the world. You could argue he has forgone traditional artistic rights in his practice and when asked about the gift shop specifically, a Live Nation representative replied the work was in the public domain. There's no question the internet is rife¹ with unauthorized Banksy T-shirts and fridge magnets, but if the organizers want to create a legitimate retrospective of the artist's work, they might consider setting a higher ethical standard than that of the online hawkers².

The Globe and Mail, June 13, 2018
