Texte 1

Gogol Ganduli is a Hindu American young man. He is dating Maxine who lives a life far wealthier and far more culturally "American" than Gogol is accustomed to.

Maxine is open about her past, showing him photographs of her ex-boyfriends in the pages of a marble-papered album, speaking of those relationships without embarrassment or regret. She has the gift of accepting her life; as he comes to know her, he realizes that she has never wished she were anyone other than herself, raised
5 in any other place, in any other way. This, in his opinion, is the biggest difference between them, a thing far more foreign to him than the beautiful house she'd grown up in, her education at private schools. In addition, he is continually amazed by how much Maxine emulates her parents, how much she respects their tastes and their ways. [...] There is none of the exasperation he feels with his own parents. No sense of obligation.
10 Unlike his parents, they pressure her to do nothing, and yet she lives faithfully, happily, at their side.

She is surprised to hear certain things about his life: that all his parents' friends are Bengali, that they had an arranged marriage, that his mother cooks Indian food every day, that she wears saris<sup>1</sup> and a bindi<sup>2</sup>. "Really?" she says, not fully believing
15 him. "But you're so different. I would never have thought that." He doesn't feel insulted, but he is aware that a line has been drawn all the same. To him the terms of his parents' marriage are something at once unthinkable and unremarkable; nearly all their friends and relatives had been married in the same way. But their lives bear no resemblance to that of Gerald and Lydia: expensive pieces of jewelry presented on Lydia's birthday,
20 flowers brought home for no reason at all, the two of them kissing openly, going for walks through the city, or to dinner, just as Gogol and Maxine do. Seeing the two of them curled up on the sofa in the evenings, Gerald's head resting on Lydia's shoulder, Gogol is reminded that in all his life he has never witnessed a single moment of physical affection between his parents. Whatever love exists between them is an
25 utterly private, uncelebrated thing. "That's so depressing," Maxine says when he confesses this fact to her, and though it upsets him to hear her reaction, he can't help but agree. One day Maxine asks him if his parents want him to marry an Indian girl. She poses the question out of curiosity, without hoping for a particular response. He

30 feels angry at his parents then, wishing they could be otherwise, knowing in his heart what the answer is. "I don't know," he tells her. "I guess so. It doesn't matter what they want."

Texte 2

Growing up in a household with two cultures

[...] As I got older, I slowly started embracing myself. It helped that we were now living in New York City, the place where all cultures run rampant<sup>3</sup> and collide into each other. I learned that there were more than the two cultures that I had been exposed to, and I also learned that there were many other mixed children around me. Armed with
5 this simple, yet new, knowledge, I felt like a weight had been lifted off my shoulders— I was not alone. People were also much more accepting of different races, ethnicities, and cultures, and I no longer felt self-conscious about the way that I looked. [...]

At twenty-seven, I have now learned what a blessing it is to be biracial. Growing up with two very different, even contrasting, cultures, I have learned to appreciate all 10 cultures that much more. It has been said that biracial individuals are more accepting and open-minded, and I find that I am both. I have an eclectic mixture of friends from all races, ethnicities, and upbringings, and I can finally appreciate the fact that by not belonging to one specific culture, I can fit in anywhere. I would like to think that I absorbed the positives out of each of my parents' cultures, and have been able to 15 create a piecemeal version of myself that I am comfortable being. [...]
